It’s Time To Be More Family Friendly
Paying tribute to working moms

Message from the Chairman

Mothers son is now 8 years old, and he will be a Primary 3 student in the new school year. In the blink of an eye, this also marks my eighth year of being a working mom. During these years, it is never easy to juggle between family life and career. I have learned a lot about the challenges that local working moms are facing.

As a mother, watching my son growing up is a magical and amazing experience. I wouldn’t want to miss those little moments, whether it’s burping my baby boy after milk feeding, or watching him take his first steps and say his first words. Yet, as a career woman, I also need to dedicate my time and effort for my work, so that I can gain satisfaction from my job.

Suffice to say, it is a challenge for working mothers to balance their professional and personal life. In a fast-paced city like Hong Kong, working mothers are racing against the clock everyday, as they attempt to fulfill their work and family commitments. The stress these mothers have to experience is not difficult to imagine.

In the past few months, I had the privilege to voice out for women’s empowerment and child rights internationally. I attended the Boao Forum for Asia and APEC Women Leadership Forum 2019. Through these events, I advocated the importance of UNICEF’s Twin Policy and raised the awareness about the conditions of working moms.

In fact, women’s participation in society has garnered increasing attention. The choices working mothers make in balancing between work and life have important implications for the well-being of their children. As such, women’s economic empowerment and early childhood care development should be addressed in tandem because both matters are interconnected.

Raising kids is not solely the duty of parents; society should collectively share parental responsibilities. Governments, businesses and members of the public around the world can join hands to establish family-friendly workplaces, so to advance comprehensive development in society by releasing the economic capacity of women and championing child rights at the same time.

In the second half of this year, the Hong Kong Committee for UNICEF (UNICEF HK) will start a campaign to promote family-friendly policies. The policies enable working moms to have a better parenting environment by balancing their roles in family and work. The campaign will kick off with an advanced version of “Say Yes to Breastfeeding” campaign, which aims at gaining more support for breastfeeding in workplaces and public premises. Let’s help more new working moms to stay positive and give every child the best start in life.

Helping children in crisis

Mozambique hit by deadly storm twice in six weeks

Pregnant Mom climbed up to give birth

“I was with my little 2-year-old son, when suddenly, without warning, the water started to get inside my house, I had no option but to jump on top of a nearby mango tree. Then the pain started, and I had no one around to help me. In a few hours I gave birth to my baby girl, Sara, on top of that mango tree. I was completely alone with Sara and my son. We stayed on top of that tree for two more days after her birth. Later, the neighbours helped me to get down.” – Amelia

The above story was told by Amelia, who survived the deadly cyclone this March in Mozambique. Six weeks later, the country was hit again by its strongest ever cyclone, which implied a long way to recover.

In the devastated country, 1.1 million children are in urgent need of assistance. Education is at risk for 330,000 students as more than 3,500 classrooms were damaged in storm. UNICEF has been working on the ground for months to protect children and prevent deadly diseases.

Five key areas of UNICEF’s response
- Preventing cholera by vaccination and keeping the hygiene of drinking water;
- Rebuilding the water supply system;
- Taking care of children separated from family or out of school;
- Protecting children from violence; and
- Assisting communities with the issuance of birth registration and other identity documents lost during the floods — urgent action on this can reduce the risk of trafficking and child marriage.

Hong Kong Committee for UNICEF

The Hong Kong Committee for UNICEF (UNICEF HK) was founded in 1985 as an independent local non-governmental organization to raise funds through donations, partnerships with companies, special events, etc. to support UNICEF’s work. UNICEF HK also promotes and advocates for children’s rights by organizing education and youth programmes in Hong Kong.

Family-friendly Policies:

Children's brain development is not innate, but starts from the first 1,000 days of life. Children's brains are constructed by a complex interplay of rapid neural connections. When children grow up in a healthy environment filled with love and protection, where they eat nutritious food and are exposed to stimulation experiences, these new connections can occur at an once-in-a-lifetime speed of up to 1 million every second. This process forms the foundation of the brain and helps to determine children's cognitive ability, language and social skills.

To give children the best start in life, parents need to take action in three areas — eat, play and love — breastfeeding, sufficient play time and taking care of them with love during their growth.

In Hong Kong, it is common to have both parents working full time. Yet, the time and effort for parenting has become a luxury, as they have to juggle between work and family commitments. After burning themselves out in the office, these parents can hardly maintain their energy for their children at home. UNICEF points out that taking care of children is a responsibility shared by everyone in society. Employers, including the government and enterprises, should work together to create a family-friendly working environment with sufficient support for employees, so to share the responsibility of parenting with working mothers and fathers, and contribute to early childhood development.

According to a local survey, returning to work is a main reason for most mothers in stopping breastfeeding in the first three months after delivery. (Tarrant et al (2010). Breastfeeding and weaning practices among Hong Kong mothers: a prospective study. BMC pregnancy and childbirth, 10(1), 27.)

However, it is a challenge for working mothers to take on the dual role of parenting and working. In fact, many new working mothers have stopped breastfeeding too quickly1.

The UNICEF Twin Policy suggests that governments should address women's economic empowerment and early childhood care and development in tandem in terms of making social policies. In the first half of this year, UNICEF HK Chairman Judy Chen attended the Boao Forum for Asia and APEC Women Leadership Forum, calling on the international community to respond to the Twin Policy and providing working moms with family-friendly policies and environment in the workplace. This is to release the female labour force, and to ensure that early childhood development is protected, so that they can balance their work and parenting commitments.

The increased awareness in gender equality means that more and more women are playing important roles and making contributions to different companies. Even when they have become mothers, they insist on returning to the workplace to continue their professional life.

A participant noted that balancing work and family life would improve employees’ morale, and this would have positive effect in recruiting and retaining talented employees. In the long run, the participant suggested that this could also improve productivity, in which employers, employees and society could reap benefits.

Play is one of the three major elements of early childhood development. A true and happy childhood starts from playing. However, how to play will be the most beneficial to children? Children’s play can take different forms, including adult-led structured play and child-led free play.

If children need to build the specified shapes according to the instructions given by adults, or build a bridge to get more components, the play is structured in the sense that children have to follow instructions. This is structured play.

On the other hand, free play enables children to lead and explore all possibilities actively by its characteristics of improvisation, change, flexibility and without a defined learning goal. Adults only need to provide components, companionship and safety, or they can become playmates according to the pace of the children. In addition, free play helps older children enhance their social and self-expression skills.

The Hong Kong Committee for UNICEF (UNICEF HK) recommends that children should enjoy one hour of free play time everyday. This January, UNICEF HK launched “for every child, #EatPlayLove” in Stanley. The three-day event was the first time the Imagination Playground open to children and their parents in Stanley, thus allowed families enjoying and learning about free play together.

Children are the best play experts. In the Imagination Playground, children can choose blocks in various sizes and shapes to play with their own ideas and build playing space. From little mazes to enormous castles, from vehicles to seesaws, every child becomes young architects and inventors.

The first-ever “Floating Classroom” was also launched at the same time. On the ferry prying the sometimes smooth and sometimes rough waters between Stanley and Aberdeen, our specialists kept interacting non-stop with children and demonstrating to parents the many parent-child plays that are suitable for playing at anytime and anywhere.

A parent said, “The scenery of the sea was just like a teaching material that helped expand a child’s horizons. Also, through participating in the lectures and the Imagination Playground, I came to understand play is just a part of a child’s growth. The most important thing is for parents to spend time with their kids.”

Enhanced Education Web Portal for Both Parents & Teachers

To further underscore the importance of parental involvement in early childhood development, we have expanded our education web portal to include wide-ranging and practical parenting information for parents. For example, parents can download a guidebook on baby talk, or they can check out play tips and true or false questions on raising children.

In addition, the education web portal also provides a wealth of learning and teaching materials for both students and teachers. These materials cover local and global topics, such as children’s rights, international children’s issues and Global Goals fact sheets.

“for every child, #EatPlayLove” will take place in different districts and promote the three elements of early childhood development—eat, play, love—to local parents. Imagination Playground will be on tour as well, where children can have free play fun. Please follow us on Facebook @UNICEF Hong Kong for more information.
In China, just about half of the pregnant women receive five antenatal care visits as recommended by the government. The situation is even worse in the poor mountainous areas due to distance and difficult transportation. In fact, some pregnant women prefer to save a few bucks of fare, or they are busy with tending livestock and living hand-to-mouth. Others refuse to receive pregnancy check-ups because to them, taking an antenatal exam is not a traditional practice.

Since 2013, UNICEF has worked with China’s Ministry of Commerce and launched the Cash Transfers for Deprived Children project. Through the project, cash subsidies are given to women so that they can receive vital maternal and child health services, such as antenatal care visit, hospital delivery and vaccinations for their babies. After introducing the project in 15 counties in Yunnan, Gansu, Sichuan and other provinces, the number of hospitalized pregnant women was supported by 95 per cent, and nearly 95 per cent of the pregnant women were supported by hospital services. As of the beginning of this year, around 25,802 mother-baby pairs have benefited from the initiative.

Economic difficulties

Le Maocao, Gansu: She lives in an alpine pastoral region at an altitude of 2,750 metres. As she is busy with tending yak and sheep everyday, and has a hand-to-mouth existence, she refuses to receive antenatal care visits and hospital delivery although government assistance covers most of the medical costs.

Transportation problems

Ji Duo, Sichuan: “With my first baby, my mother-in-law helped me to deliver. I bled a lot and was in a life-threatening situation for a long time. During my second pregnancy, the doctor in our village asked me to go to the township hospital for pregnancy check-up. It took 1.5 hours to the town and cost 40 RMB for a round trip transfer. I didn’t have money.”

Cultural and custom

Xiong Li, Yunnan: “I would like to go to the hospital for visits but family elders disagreed because of spending money and they also said that they never give birth in the hospital before.”

In March, BTS took the Hong Kong stage and performed four shows as part of the BTS WORLD TOUR LOVE YOURSELF. They spread the same message and called for the public’s support in ending violence against children.

Why don’t rural mothers receive pregnancy check-up

In 2017, South Korean boy band BTS partnered with UNICEF on the #LoveMyself campaign. It was an effort to raise awareness about violence towards children and young people around the world. The campaign supports the ongoing UNICEF’s #ENDviolence initiative to make the world a safer place for the younger generation.

Little directors of “Make A Video” won prizes

The “Make A Video” contest, organized by UNICEF HK, encourages youth to make their inner voice heard by society through filming. The works of two contestants won awards locally and internationally.

Little director Tsang Choi-shu, with her one minute video, On, reached the Top Ten in the youth category and eventually won the Special Mention in the 24th ifva Awards organized by the Hong Kong Arts Centre. She said that she saw herself as a dark horse, and it was really magical when she learned that her work was shortlisted. And the recognition was a real bonus as the video was the first work that was written, directed and acted by herself. “It was a milestone, I knew I was not qualified, and I have to work hard in the future.”

Another little director, Cheung Cho-yi, went to the Netherlands to compete for The One Minutes Jr. Awards and won an award with rumour.net.

UNICEF HK Charity Run goes green

The UNICEF HK Charity Run, our annual flagship fundraising event, has seen support from over 130,000 participants running for children in the past 13 years. From a humble beginning, it is now the largest road-running charity event in Hong Kong.

To reduce the impact on the environment, we have implemented a range of waste management measures. Last year, we recycled a total of 210 kg of paper, 165 kg of plastic bottles and 432 kg of banana peels. We also distributed reusable cups to the runners.

The Charity Run this year is tentatively scheduled for 24 November, and once again it will be held at the Hong Kong Disneyland Resort and Sunny Bay. Stay tuned to our website (www.unicef.org.hk/en) for more details.

Please cut along the line.
